To grow lilies successfully you must have well drained soil. Lilies love humus-compost, old manure, bone meal or any vegetable matter you wish to turn under. Lilies are not at their best the first year you plant them and a few will have lazy periods in which they do not show up for a summer. Don't give up too easily, they are too spectacular. A few may not grow well for you. Why not try others? There are so many to choose from. All those listed above are hardy and grow on almost any well drained soil, they like shade at their feet.

If you catch the Lily bug I can supply you with many more varieties than I have listed above. Future listings will contain the newest and finest on the market. I am glad to discuss problems with my customers. Lilies should be planted in small groups and proper placement in your garden will have much to do with how you like them. Add distinction to your grounds with the favorites of Kew and Windsor gardens.

Lily bulbs are always dug and delivered in the late fall. A Lily bulb is never dormant and for this reason a good bulb should be firm with a good live root system on the bottom. Plant immediately 3 or 4 inches below the ground, in general the larger the bulb the deeper you plant, however they will pull themselves down to the level they prefer so don't plant too deep. If you buy dried up storage or counter lilies you are wasting your money. Lilies are easy IF you follow these simple rules and buy fresh disease free bulbs acclimated to your climate. Compare our prices.

All lilies listed may be seen in my gardens or at the North American Lily Show at Madison July 8 to 10, 1960. You are invited.

We have a scenic 120 acre hill farm in the unglaciated area of western Dane County, Wisconsin with picnic and hiking facilities for a day's outing. Our farm, including over 100 beds of lilies, is open to our customers on Friday through Sunday, June through August. July is the best month to see lilies.
